From the President.....

We end April with the People's Climate March at the Open Space in Traverse City this Saturday at noon. There is a lot of enthusiasm in our area for protecting planet Earth. Joining the March on Saturday is just one step along the way to safeguarding our planet from climate change denial, cut backs in funding for the Great Lakes and stripping of smart environmental regulations.

It will be a family friendly event. Bring your children and grandchildren. Come over to the LWVLC table and say "Hello!"

On May 2, Joan Hunault Barb Krause and I will attend LWVMI training on Redistricting Issues. It is highly anticipated that a constitutional amendment for an independent redistricting committee will be on the ballot in 2018. We will bring back what we learn and be ready to provide presentations to League members and other local organizations.

On May 19-21 Vina Mikesell, Joan Hunault, Christi Bardenhagen, Tricia Denton, Sue Miller, Suzanne Hoff, Sam Getsinger and I will attend the LWVMI Convention in Lansing. A big thank you to all who have volunteered to travel and participate in this important biennial meeting. Our own Vina Mikesell and Joan Hunault have been nominated to be on the LWVMI state board!!

Last but not least, we hope to see you all at our LWVLC Annual Dinner and Meeting on May 25th at the Homestead. Reservations are due May 15th. This year-end event again promises to be informative and fun.

Goodbye April showers. Hello May flowers.

*Best regards,
Marian*

IMMIGRATION CHALLENGES IN LEELANAU COUNTY: WHO WILL HARVEST OUR PRODUCE?

The standing-room-only crowd at our April 5th forum attested to the fact that county residents are concerned about many things: the effect immigration policy has on our growers and workers; how to balance our country's need to protect the borders with our value of compassion; and what, if anything, the average citizen can do.

LWVLC Vice President Christi Bardenhagen began the discussion “I think everyone loves our Leelanau County agricultural economy – cherry blossoms, orchards, dairy farms, rye fields hops, vineyards, and that fabulous sweet corn.” “However,” she noted “the health of our agricultural industry has been tied directly to immigration.” She noted that many seasonal migrant agricultural workers fear arrest, detention, deportation, and the breakup of their families.

Susan Reed, attorney with the Michigan Immigrant Rights Center, reported big changes in immigration policy, following President Trump’s January Executive Order, and Homeland Security Secretary Kelly’s February implementation orders. Previously, certain priorities were set for detention and deportation of undocumented workers. Law-abiding undocumented workers were “outside priorities,” and generally allowed to work. New policies jettison that priority framework. Now, Reed advised, “no one can say they are ‘outside priorities’ and avoid detention and deportation.” Consequently, increased worksite enforcement actions in west Michigan by Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) are expected.

Local fruit grower, and former Leelanau County Extension Agricultural Agent, Jim Bardenhagen said “Agriculture supports enforcement at the border,” and observed the “U.S. Attorney General is encouraging cooperation with ICE” or risking the loss of homeland security funding. He observed, “Growers and migrant communities live with uncertainty.” Last season, fewer workers stayed in the fields longer hours each day, harvesting until nightfall. He described the H2A visa program which reduces uncertainty about worker availability, but at a cost—about $1,400 to $1,700 per worker. Bardenhagen noted that seasonal and migrant workers now find work more easily in Canada.

Gladys Munoz, co-founder of the Justice and Peace Advocacy Center (JPAC), reported that today “people are afraid.” JPAC distributes information to workers, explaining their rights and helpful contacts, if they encounter law enforcement officials. They also train volunteers to monitor those encounters—rapid response teams whose members do not interfere, but observe, and, if possible, ascertain the detention site when workers are separated from their families.

Joe Hubbell, Leelanau County prosecutor, said “I understand the fear,” but noted his office does not see evidence of racial profiling by local law enforcement. He worries that current immigration policies have a chilling effect on those who need the assistance of law enforcement—for example, in the event of child abuse or domestic assault. Hubbell acknowledged the government’s legitimate concern in “knowing who is here,” and the need to “deport criminals.” But, he asked, “What about their U.S. born kids?” That, he observed, complicates matters. Hubbell re-capped court cases that impose financial liability on municipalities when persons are detained in local jails merely on an ICE detainer rather than an actual warrant issued by a magistrate. As a county prosecutor sworn to enforce state laws, he observed that local law enforcement must grapple with the thorny questions raised by detention when cooperating with agencies entrusted to enforce federal laws.

June Meeting Preview

WALKING IN A GOOD WAY

Join us on Wednesday, June 7th at noon at the Eyaawing Museum and Cultural Center on North West Bay Shore (M22) in Peshawbestown.

Anishinaabe native Hank Bailey, retired GTB Natural Resources; Jonathan Aylward, current Tribal biologist; and Joanne Cook, GTB Tribal member, will share Anishinaabe History and Culture.

Bailey, author of “Walking-in-a-good way,” states

“One of the first things I think of when reflecting on my life is what we refer to as the Circle of Life. We have many teachings about this that are found in what is known as the Medicine Wheel. The Circle of Life encompasses everything that we know of and many many things that are out of our view. As you picture a circle, think about the fact that the circle does not end. This is my view on life: EVERYTHING has its place in the circle. To keep harmony and balance in the world I must do what I can to help keep the circle intact by not destroying parts of it to the point that they are lost. To achieve this, one must have respect for all things. Sometimes this is not easy.”

The LWVLC Early Childhood Needs and Services Committee will not meet during its regularly scheduled time in May due to a time conflict with the LWVMI Convention. (Several committee members will be attending.)

Committee members are planning a display at the Annual Meeting, highlighting the many educational and advocacy activities with which the committee has been involved.
